I have not changed my opinion respecting the condition of the lungs since the autopsy. That gratuitous statement in the autopsical report had no effect upon it. I knew that the right lung was full of puspoints (not one great abcess, but a hundred little abscesses), so that when a knife was drawn through it the pus followed it. I shall not go beyond the lungs. I know something of their condition. I will leave the rest to the practitioners of their school. They are able and ready to take it in hand. Some of them are already preparing. Hammond, you know, has a three hundred page book in press on the subject. Other distinguished allopathists
